

Open House

London

16–17 September 2017

25 years ago, when Open House was launched, London was a different city to the one we live in today. Many of the landmarks that we pass by daily were not there, and our business environment looked and felt very different. The term ‘start-up’ was not one you were likely to hear.

Since then, London has been transformed in many ways, not least in terms of the rise and consolidation of our start-up and scale-up ecosystem. We can say today without hesitation that London is a unique and world-class environment for enterprise, and the best place in the world to start and grow a business.

Meanwhile we have also seen the growth of the Open House initiative, created to give Londoners and visitors a chance to learn about, better understand and argue for quality in our built environments.

Open House provides a much-needed open forum for everyone living and working in the city to discuss the importance of quality in architecture and urban design. Crucially, there are no barriers to access – promoting openness by offering the chance to explore behind the scenes of the city, completely for free.

This year, there are over 800 buildings on show, across every single London borough. What is unique about Open House is the variety of sites – government buildings, private residences, new and old.

This year, there is a particular focus on workspaces, as we celebrate both the changing nature of work – not least the modern, vibrant and exciting spaces in which so many tech and creative start-ups thrive; but also, for example, many places of manufacturing that so often are out of the public eye.

Shortly after my election as Mayor, and following the EU referendum, I launched the #LondonIsOpen campaign to show to the world the best of our city. In partnership with Open House, I want to use this opportunity to help demonstrate and spread that message both among Londoners and through the world. To show that London remains open for business, for creativity, innovation and investment – and Open House is a perfect way to showcase the diverse and dynamic nature of London’s economy.

I encourage everyone to spend some time during Open House weekend visiting at least one of the many buildings that are opening their doors. This is a unique opportunity to explore London’s architecture, its economy and its people.

As a Mayor of London, I’m delighted to support Open House and proud to see it celebrate its 25th anniversary year.

Sadiq Khan,
Mayor of London

Choose Your Own London

We are so lucky. We have London –
Europe's biggest city – and all its wonders, on our doorstep.

This city of houses, in all kinds of styles. This skyscraper city, peppered with 'icons'. This city of ancient guilds. This city of hi-tech hubs. This city with a million side extensions. This city with a shortage of ordinary homes that are cheap enough to rent if you're earning the minimum wage (OK – that's not so lucky).

There are grand government buildings and stylish state schools. Monumental office blocks, and big things underground (Crossrail's tunnels run for 26 miles). This city, a sprawling, rising townscape, north and south of the Thames. This city, home to millions of people, from all over the world. This city. Our city – especially this Open House weekend.

Open House allows us to make our own London, one that is unique, personalised, tempered and cut to fit. Maybe your London space is a residential place, of great social housing like the Silchester Estate.

Or maybe your London is all about concrete (you're going through your 'Brutalist' phase), with perennials like Trellick Tower high on your hit-list, as well as hidden gems like The Embassy of Slovakia. The public realm – and the role landscapes play in shaping our favourite neighbourhoods is another line of inquiry.

Or are you more interested in how the city works? You can find out, for example, how heat and power is provided at Pimlico District Heating Undertaking; Southwark Integrated Waste Management, with its wavy roofline is also well worth a trip. Whatever kind of London you want to see, you can find it in our guide to this year's Open House.

Elsewhere among these pages, to celebrate our 25th birthday, we showcase your favourite buildings and look back over the past quarter century. It is a timeframe in which London has been utterly transformed. A timeframe in which a new skyline has emerged – the Gherkin, the Shard and the London Eye are all younger than Open House! And a timeframe that has seen whole new districts arise. The new London forming in the shadow of Stratford's Queen Elizabeth Olympic Park is one of the most vibrant districts anywhere in the world – more than 100 languages are spoken in its borough, Newham.

Wherever you choose to go, whichever buildings you visit and explore, just remember: London – weird, wonderful, wicked London – is ours! How lucky are we?

Director's Picks

4-8 Hafer Road

Peter Barber's cool, controlled housing nods and winks – quite deliberately – to the LCC heyday in the 60s and 70s. That's a good thing.

Blackhorse Workshop

What's the future of regen? Maybe it's this wood and metal workshop. Maybe it's not. Well worth your time though, especially if you're an aspiring 'maker'.

Lullaby Factory

Like a strange little sister to the Lloyds, this secret 'building' is the oddest and most beautiful of all the projects listed this year. 'Nuff said.

Years of Open House

Let's go back,
way back, to 1992 and the first
Open House...

- John Major wins the election to seal a fourth consecutive Tory government but months later crashes Britain out of the ERM.
- Windsor Castle catches fire, the YBAs star at the Saatchi Gallery for the first time and Paternoster Square is greenlit by planners. Smartphones don't exist. The South Bank wasn't a place to hang out.
- For the lucky 100 who booked, Open House kicks off for the first time. "In France, there is an Architecture Week," reads the press release penned by founder Victoria Thornton. "In Glasgow there is an Open Door Day. In Brussels there is a Heritage Day. But there was nothing in London. Until now."

● Word gets out. There's a buzz. In 1993, four boroughs take part: Greenwich, Camden, Lambeth and Hackney. London is changing. The Mappin & Webb building at Bank is demolished to make way for James Stirling's No.1 Poultry. Further east in Bow, Rachel Whiteread's iconic 'House' – a concrete cast of the interior of a typical East End dwelling – goes on to win the Turner Prize. Weeks later it is demolished too.

● The 50p 1993 Open House guide is two A4 sheets, but the programme is familiar. There are debuts by perennials like Camden's Alexandra Road estate, the Hackney Empire, the Queen's House, Greenwich and Lambeth's Stockwell Bus garage.

● The 1994 guide lists over 200 buildings in 13 boroughs (and for the first time, features the skyline key, designed by Newell and Sorrell). London gains three significant buildings: the Channel 4 HQ by the Richard Rogers Partnership, Terry Farrell's M16 HQ and Grimshaw's Waterloo Eurostar Terminal, built to serve the just-completed Channel Tunnel. But The Sunday Trading Act (1994) permitting Sunday shopping, will go on to play a far bigger rule in shaping the future of London's townscape.

● In 1995 the Hindu temple of Neasden opens, Zaha Hadid wins the Cardiff Bay Opera House competition (only to see it junked a few months later) and Open House expands to be a full weekend event. In 1996 – the year of the Docklands bombing and the first ever Stirling Prize – the weekend festival logs over 38,000 visits to 19 buildings in the City of London alone.

● In 1997, the sweeping form of Frank Gehry's Guggenheim Museum in Bilbao is dubbed iconic and critics heralds a new style. In London, the British Library (by Colin St John Wilson) finally completes and Shakespeare's Globe opens. Open House grows – it now has three staff and five volunteers – and for the first time runs a programme exclusively for kids. And the Labour Party wins a landslide election with Tony Blair Prime Minister.

● Over 450 buildings and 24 boroughs take part in 1998 but the big stories break elsewhere: Enric Miralles and Benedetta Tagliabue (with RMJM) win the Scottish Parliament competition and English Heritage list Park Hill in Sheffield, reviving interest in British Brutalism. Back in London, Richard Rogers is appointed chair of the Urban Task Force by Deputy PM John Prescott.

● In 1999, London dominates: the Jubilee Line extension, the British Museum's Great Court (Norman Foster), the Lord's Media Centre (Future Systems) and the Millennium Dome (Richard Rogers) open in time for millennium celebrations. Lottery-funded public building abounds. Nick Raynsford MP, briefly a mayoral candidate, launches Open House at Lancaster House.

● London goes into overdrive in 2000: independent candidate Ken Livingstone is elected as Mayor (his HQ, City Hall, designed by Foster and Partners, completes in 2002). Tate Modern opens, transforming a defunct power station into a free-to-enter gallery. Zaha Hadid designs the first Serpentine Pavilion in Hyde Park. Will Alsop's Peckham Library opens and bags the Stirling Prize. The White Cube gallery comes to Shoreditch. And RIBA gives Frank Gehry its seal of approval, the Royal Gold Medal. Open House breaks records: Westminster alone logs 131,000 visits to 91 buildings.

● In 2001, Tony Blair wins another election. Months later the World Trade Centre in New York is destroyed in a terror attack. Security is tightened on London's streets. The first in a generation of great London schools completes: BDP's Hampden Gurney in Marylebone but Britain's best building is a Wilkinson Eyre bridge, linking Gateshead with Newcastle. Open House commissions poetry celebrating six London landmarks and Mayor Ken Livingstone launches the 10th Open House at Australia House. In 2002, twenty-nine boroughs and more than 500 buildings take part with Camden creating its own guide to cover Kings Cross's bumper crop.

● It's 2003: London introduces the congestion charge. Paternoster Square opens alongside St Paul's Cathedral. Frank Gehry's Maggie's Centre in Dundee completes. And Future Systems' blobby icon for Selfridges pops into place in Birmingham. Open House initiates Open Site, which draws visitors to Wembley Stadium and St Pancras construction projects, and Architecture on the Move providing onboard commentary of buildings seen from DLR trains. And more than one million people take to London's streets to protest against plans to invade Iraq.

● In 2004, Open House's new website draws 15 million hits, the Scottish Parliament finally opens and the first London Festival of Architecture takes place. But this is the year of the Gherkin, or 30 St Mary Axe. Not only does it participate in Open House for the first time just months after completion, with mile long queues, it hosts the launch in its top floor restaurant too. Weeks later it wins the Stirling Prize.

● In 2005, Tony Blair wins another general election for the Labour Party, London wins the bid to host the 2012 Olympics and the city suffers terror attacks targeting the transport network. The first ever Maggie's and Open House Night Hike takes place, and Open House Junior launches.

● By 2006 Open House hosts more than 700 free-to-enter buildings and attracts more than a quarter of a million souls. London's architectural upgrade continues (half of the Stirling Prize's shortlisted projects are based in the capital). The Mayor announces Design for London, a public realm agency built upon the principles of Richard Rogers' Urban Task Force. And the Government introduces the Code for Sustainable Homes to foster low energy design. In Kirkcaldy, Zaha Hadid's Maggie's Centre opens, her first British building, while in the US, influential urban activist and writer Jane Jacobs dies.

● Olympic Minister Tessa Jowell launches Open House 2007 at East London's new rail hub, Stratford International. Five future sites, partially developed, also participate in the programme, setting a trend for future events. St Pancras reopens as the Eurostar terminal and Allies and Morrison completes the refurbishment of Royal Festival Hall. Ian Simpson's Beetham Tower, Britain's tallest residential skyscraper, opens in Manchester. Bold Tendencies, a sculpture gallery in a Peckham multi-storey car park opens for the first time. 2008 is all about THE CRASH while London flirts with star brand names: Rogers' Heathrow Terminal 5 opens and Gehry fashions a pavilion for the Serpentine Gallery. Social media starts to predominate.

● 2009 is an Open House refresh: a third of all buildings are new to the programme. Sustainability is emphasised. Trips to the emerging Olympic Park book up. Rogers Stirk Harbour + Partners win the Stirling Prize for the Maggie's Centre in Charing Cross Hospital.

● David Cameron is the new prime minister after the Tories form a coalition government with the Liberals in 2010. London's bike hire scheme launches, Crossrail construction begins and Strata, the first of many hundred residential towers planned for London, completes. Open House – the organisation - is transformed. Open City is formed to 'shelter' both Open House and the educational programmes designed for schools. For the weekend, BT Tower opens its doors for the first time. In Dubai, the world's tallest building, Burj Khalifa, opens.

● In 2011, Open City launches Green Sky Thinking, a weeklong programme of events for professional city-makers, emphasising sustainability. Open House enters the mobile age with the launch of an app - the guide on your phone, with added functionality via GPS technology. Two key Olympic projects, the main stadium and the Velodrome finish ahead of schedule. And a state school, Evelyn Grace Academy, wins the Stirling prize. But London-wide riots cause untold damage and highlight the city's divisions.

The brick façades and shared space streets of Anne Mews – a terrace of homes in Barking by AHMM and Macreannor Lavington and the first new council housing in the borough for a quarter of a century – are the flip side of London's rampant development. Completed in 2012, this is somewhat overshadowed by Olympic 'parkitecture', Renzo Piano's Shard and Granary Square in King's Cross, a hugely popular privately run public space, stealing all the glory.

● In 2013, Battersea Power station, set to close for at least four years, opens for the last time, attracting 40,000 people over two days, setting an Open House record in the process. The programme too, features 853 buildings – the most ever. None of them however, is Raphael Viñoly's Walkie Talkie, which makes headlines around the world for melting cars with its huge concave glass façade.

● Rogers Stirk Harbour + Partners' 'Cheesegrater' building is the Open House smash of 2014 but the public mood is not overly generous to this controversial building type: some see them as symbols of endless greed, others simply demand they be easier on the eye. Much the same arguments are levelled at the Garden Bridge, a semi-private, publically-funded park strung across the Thames, which nevertheless receives planning permission.

● In 2015, David Cameron is once again Prime Minister as the Conservative Party wins the general election. The Stirling Prize this year feels politically charged. London's housing 'problem' is thrown into stark relief by two quite different projects: Neo Bankside, dubbed homes for millionaires or 'Oligarchitecture' and Darbshire Place, family homes in the East End by social housing experts Peabody. Neither win, with Burntwood, a state school in Wandsworth, landing the gong. Open House launches in The Foreign & Commonwealth Office with founder Victoria Thornton announcing her retirement as director.

● In 2016, the Open House guide is given a make-over but the initiative stays true to its founding mission. Sadly, the year is coloured by the untimely death of Zaha Hadid and the divisive Brexit vote. Yet the event itself is as big as ever and earns the support of the Mayor's Office asking Open House to partner on its post-Brexit campaign #LondonIsOpen. Milan and Lagos join Open House Worldwide. There are now 33 participating cities across 5 continents.

Open House founder Victoria Thornton

- The idea of Open House came via two different routes - the only public debate at the time was around heritage, despite the great contemporary architecture in the capital; I realised that for a public discussion about the city, everyone needed to experience it first hand.
- I knew I was onto something when there was an immediate massive response by the public, buildings were over-subscribed. The Independent came to us asking to produce the first ever full Open House London programme.
- My 'eek' moment was 9/11 in 2001 - 10 days before Open House and the phones rang with 30 buildings withdrawing in 10 minutes flat. Our media partner the Evening Standard announced 'Open House is closed' (which of course wasn't true). There was huge concern about security, but London's spirit of openness continued.
- Receiving the OBE was my proudest moment. It recognised all the work and commitment of all the thousands of people that make Open House happen.
- The success of Open House is due to the volunteers and building owners - without their generosity, Open House wouldn't happen. Also the core team of volunteers and staff. These three elements create the huge success that it is.

The Top 25

To celebrate our 25th birthday we wondered: what would a 'perfect' London actually look like? After all, in the years that have passed since the first Open House, London's skyline, its streets and its suburbs have changed beyond all recognition, and not always, you might argue, for the best. So we asked you to vote for your favourite Open House building and tell us why.

When your votes came in we drew up a list – just for fun, the top 25. Then we asked designers Graphical House to create icons of each building (in a unified style) and with them fashion what we call the Open House ‘capriccio’. Translation? A drawing of an imaginary London townscape formed of the 25 most popular Open House buildings. Whether you think the capriccio presents a perfect skyline or not, the image is compelling: familiar, in that it jumbles old and new as the real London does, but uncanny in that the size and location of each building has clearly been messed with.

You can buy your own capriccio from our online shop, and there’s a colouring-in print too (it’s for kids, but we won’t ask who it’s for when you buy one ;-)
See our website for details of where to get your copy.

You can see the top 25 buildings over the following pages, alongside the best reasons given by you for their greatness. What you have to say about your favourite London buildings is fascinating. It shows the depth of regard we all share for London’s great townscape, its incredibly variety – in style, scale, age, colour, function – and the range of emotions it can inspire within us.

Consider the evocative power of this simple reflection on the charms of Battersea Power station: ‘It reminds me of an older time and a different type of workforce’. Or this cheeky riff on Trellick Tower: ‘Brutal but classy, just like London’. Or this happy thought by a proud employee in Senate House: ‘I work here and it’s beautiful’.

If you participated in our poll to find the most loved Open House building, thank you. If you voted for the Gherkin, well done, it’s come top; Norman Foster’s voluptuous skyscraper really has usurped St Paul’s as the symbol of London’s skyline. The one-word quote we selected from all the supporting reasons says it all: “Iconic”.

The Thornton 'Open City' Lecture

Rory Olcayto announces Tate's new Director Maria Balshaw as the inaugural Thornton Lecture speaker.

The lecture is named in honour of Open House and Open City founder Victoria Thornton. Victoria's contribution to London, and the public's appreciation and understanding of architecture and urban design, is immense. Open House – unpretentious, egalitarian and free – is the biggest success story to emerge from British architectural culture in living memory. Literally millions of Britons have enjoyed this friendly September weekend event for the past quarter century. The lecture, to be held annually, has a simple premise: a guest speaker of international repute, addressing the topic of 'the open city'.

Our inaugural speaker is Maria Balshaw, the new Tate director. Maria's ambition is to make the Tate "the most culturally inclusive institution in the world". And while Maria is known for her ability to engage new audiences – she doubled the numbers at the Whitworth Gallery in Manchester during her tenure – she's also passionate about great architecture. Indeed Maria saw her own project, a refurbished and extended Whitworth, vie for the Stirling Prize in 2015, only for it to be pipped at the post by Burntwood school.

Maria believes that people make cities what they are, and that we should celebrate public life at every opportunity. Her first act as Tate Director was to show an artwork in Tate Britain of Khadija Saye, a young artist who died in the Grenfell fire. So while we have no idea how Maria will interpret 'the open city' for her lecture, we know we're in for a treat. Given her passion for architecture, and the arts – and people – and crucially, the public nature of her work, and of course the small fact that she heads up one of London's great cultural institutions, we cannot think of a better speaker for the first Thornton Open City Lecture.

A limited number of tickets will be available through our public ballot for the lecture on November 30th. Details of the ballot will be announced in October.

Open Londinium

Beneath the City of London's soaring steel towers lies Rome, writes historian
Tom Holland

Long before England existed, London was a Roman capital. Deep beneath the tarmac and steel of the City of London, fragments of Londinium, like the bones of some titanic beast, can still be found. Sometimes, indeed, the dead are literally underfoot. Anyone visiting the Gherkin for Open House London should be sure to look on Bury Street, to the side of its entrance, for the grave of a Roman girl. Discovered in 1995 as the foundations were being dug, the skeleton was re-interred in 2007. The Lady Mayoress of the City attended, to pay her respects to the 1,600 year old Londoner. The Romans are often closer to us than we might think.

This year, to mark its 25th anniversary, Open House is celebrating London's earliest architecture. The origins of the capital reach all the way back to the reign of the Emperor Claudius, who in AD 43 ordered the conquest of Britain, and whose engineers, seven years later, embarked on the construction of the very first London Bridge. Its annihilation a decade on at the hands of Boudicca's vengeful hordes proved only a temporary setback. By the time that Hadrian arrived in Londinium in 122, the city was securely established as the political, financial and commercial capital of Britain. When walls were built around it at the end of the 2nd century AD, they enclosed an urban space that ranked as the fourth largest north of the Alps.

Portions of these fortifications can still be seen, with a particularly impressive stretch at Tower Bridge. Under the appropriately named London Wall, there is even a chunk of the eponymous masonry stranded in the car park. Equally subterranean is the only fragment of a Roman domestic structure available to view anywhere in the City: the so-called 'Billingsgate House'. Discovered in 1848, its most notable feature is a complex of baths, complete with underfloor heating. Rarely open to the public, the opportunity to visit is a precious one indeed.

A much more recent and spectacular discovery is the amphitheatre, which was located in 1988 directly next to the Guildhall. This is where the inhabitants of Roman London would have assembled to watch gladiators fight: a practice which is the theme of a small exhibition named – appropriately enough – 'Trauma'. If, in many ways, the Romans can seem just like us, then in other ways a large part of their fascination is just how alien they were. To visit the Roman city is to enter a world that is mysterious as well as familiar. Nowhere will better serve to convey this than the London Mithraeum: an underground temple to a bull-slaying Persian god that has led a thoroughly peripatetic existence since its discovery in 1954. Rebuilt soon afterwards on Queen Victoria Street, it has now been moved back to its original site as part of the Bloomberg development, seven metres below the modern street level. Although not ready for Open House, it will be in time for the autumn. The experience promises to be unmissable. The worship of Mithras took place underground, in eerie, shadow-haunted chambers: much like the experience of visiting London's Roman remains.

Joseph Conrad, imagining the wilderness surveyed by the first centurion to navigate the Thames, famously declared that it too, like the upper reaches of the Congo or the Amazon, had once been "one of the dark places of the earth." The chance to explore the first urban settlement to have been founded on the river's banks is one that no Londoner will want to miss.

Tom Appleton wonders what London would be like if its commercial buildings had more open ground floors

As a child and a frustrated (early) architect, I would work my pencil across the paper producing buildings and roadways. The only thing these creations had in common was that none of the structures actually touched the ground. Even as an impressionable 8 year old I was aware of the shrinking ground space in our cities and how something was going to have to change.

Fast forward a number of years and being lucky enough to travel to different world cities, it became evident I wasn't the only one wishing things could float above us. Many of the buildings in New York, Chicago, Hong Kong (notable and possibly the best example being the HSBC building by Foster + Partners) and other custodians of the traditional 'skyscraper' seemed to be letting us mere mortals walk around – not the bottom – but the underneath of them, and through into the next one.

I am pleased that this way of thinking has now moved over to London, and where once our traditional Victorian and late 20th century buildings hit the ground with a certain 'here I am', there now seems to be a movement towards inclusivity. This is evident not just at the bottom of buildings such as the 'Cheesegrater' but also in terms of the breaking up of buildings such as the Barts estate where the ground floor user has a much more interactive experience.

We at Rocket Properties are currently working with architects to see how we can make the most of the ground floor experience out of fairly tight City fringe sites. This inevitably leads to a loss of floor space which, being a developer, runs in the exact opposite direction the accountants would have us go in. However, taking a more holistic view of the development, there is likely to be much more justification for a building of a certain scale if the first three or four floors are given back to the community.

These ground floor spaces then develop into courtyards, piazzas and civic squares, all of which we have now, however the difference being the hotel/office/residential accommodation that sits above. A vertical city above an urban park. This works especially well in really hot climates, or as in our case quite wet climates.

Looking at our own City of London, this giving back to the city is mainly about the free-flow of pedestrians. But in a few years from now as space become more of a premium I may be dusting off those old drawings of buildings floating above the whole city and transport routes. Skyscrapers should take up the sky, not the ground. ☺

Blurring Boundaries

Buildings might look like fixed assets, but Jonathan Kendall uses two central London projects to show how they can be adapted to new times

During a recent 'open studio' weekend, we hung a giant inflatable shark in our reception as a whimsical reminder of the endangered Greenland shark that can live for 500 years. Buildings are too often demolished after just a few decades, while the most resilient structures embody the character of a place and can be endlessly reinvented.

Cities are remarkably adaptable. Somehow, their buildings and open spaces change over time to meet the needs of society and cope with rapid developments in technology. Two of our recently completed projects, The White Chapel Building and Angel Court, show how we're grappling with ways of reinventing old buildings and making them resilient to change.

We are finding that the boundary between inside and outside is blurring, as is the distinction between public and private space. The desire for a clear separation between the two is giving way to a much more fluid situation where the spaces of work, recreation and dwelling are overlapping.

Walking along Whitechapel High Street you can't fail to see the giant, illuminated lettering that announces 'The White Chapel Building'. Once an unloved 1980s bank, we transformed it into a public living room, surrounded by offices that were let in record time by Derwent London to creative, media and technology companies. The artist Lawrence Lek recently chose this as the location for a virtual reality installation Playstation, speculating on a future where work and play are interchangeable. In a mirror of the artwork itself, 3000 people visited the building's vast reception in one night to 'play' in the office.

Fifteen minutes' walk away, in the Bank of England Conservation Area, you'll come to a very different scale of building: Angel Court. You would never imagine that this sleek new glass tower contains the core of a 1970s building. Our aim was to use the spine of the original building to create a contemporary workplace. We transformed the experience at ground level, turning a dark alley into a sunny pedestrian street lined with restaurants and specially commissioned artwork by Sara Barker that echo the history of the area.

The White Chapel Building and Angel Court are private offices that open to the public at ground level and connect to the city. Both retain the memory of the past, while embracing the future of technology and work. These paradoxes express the fluidity and excitement of cities, and are what makes the practice of architecture so fascinating.

The landscape is the city

Landscape Institute's CEO Dan Cook writes on the infrastructural role that landscape can play in creating an open city

The landscape Institute consists of more than 5000 members spanning the fields of landscape architecture/design, planning, management, science & urban design. If you want to help or if you are wanting a career in this exciting sector linking natural systems, built environment and human interactions with places, email contact@landscapeinstitute.org

Most of our landscapes pre-date modern day development and as a result have normally been the basis for human settlement and land use choices over thousands of years. Rivers, hills, forests and coastlines have shaped, aided and even at times hindered our ability to traverse cities. London is no different.

The definition of landscape in the European Landscape Convention (ELC) covers outside spaces everywhere, at every scale and both built and natural environments. This means landscapes include countryside, green infrastructure and open spaces, plus urban spaces, civic squares, public realm and more.

The Landscape Institute not only backs the view that landscape is the primary infrastructure upon which our cities are built, but that it is vital that all cities plan, design and manage landscape just as they do other types of infrastructure.

It's important to understand that landscape's interaction between nature, built and human environments means that its benefits extend well beyond beauty and aesthetics.

With Brexit putting pressure on the perception of the United Kingdom, cities like London will need to do even more to remain 'open'. Other European Cities such as Berlin, Barcelona, Antwerp, and Bilbao are all rethinking their approach to landscapes, especially their public places, in their effort to attract talent and inward economic investment. Accessibility, well-being, resource security, quality of life, smart use of technology and inclusion are all essential ingredients.

Landscape considered as infrastructure that is well designed, funded and managed will be essential to London staying an open and successful city. ➤

If we are going to develop a more open, succesful city, this is where we need to focus:

Inclusion

- connecting communities with food growing, creating a sense of pride and ownership in local green spaces

Technology

- augmented and virtual reality provides a basis for many to use the outdoors – we should reflect on the craze of games like Pokemon Go that has connected millions to outdoor spaces
- with the Ordnance Survey creating an accessible online map of the UK's greenspaces, we can also expect to see many more interactive applications that help communities use outdoor space

Resources

- London has long had its allotments, but new commercial ventures are looking to roofs and underground spaces to grow food more sustainably

Funding

- new private rented sector housebuilding funded by Real Estate Investment Trusts, creating larger scale and longer term interests in managing public realm
- garden cities created around the edges of London

Can cities ever feel ‘human’ if we design them around the car, asks architect and town planner Riccardo Marini

What makes us happy, feel good, feel human? Jan Gehl, the Danish architect and pioneer of people-centred town planning, has a simple answer: ‘maður er manns gaman’, or ‘man is man’s joy’. It’s an old Norse saying and one I swear by. So why is it that we find it so hard to create places where people want to linger, perambulate and simply see and be seen? It’s all about the car. Most of our cities developed long before the advent of the internal combustion engine, so their urban fabric developed primarily in response to the human scale. You can see where I’m going here: forget the many benefits this private mode of transport has evidently brought – because its impact upon our cities is nothing short of catastrophic.

Humanity is hooked. We’re still selling the car as an aspirational dream. But you’ll never see an advert that shows the reality of urban driving – travelling in traffic at walking pace.

Here’s a thought. When you’re stuck in traffic remind yourself: ‘YOU ARE THE TRAFFIC’. This is serious. It’s not just the fact that cars are clogging up our streets, metaphorically squeezing the life out of them; cars and their emissions are literally killing us.

That’s a bleak reality that too many people who should know better are ignoring. Some, like ex-Mayor of New York Michael Bloomberg are taking a stand, addressing the urban spatial balance, returning roads to streets and making New York a city for people once again. Ann Hidalgo is doing the same for Paris.

What saddens me is that London was way ahead of both Paris and New York not so long ago. Considerable progress was made in developing a more people-centred public realm in the capital under Mayor Ken Livingstone (full disclosure: TFL commissioned Gehl, my employer, resulting in a 122-page report, ‘London: towards a fine city for people’, in 2004). When Livingstone failed to be re-elected in 2008, so did the commitment to redefining London’s streets.

Of course, there has been some good work carried out in London. But what’s missing is a coherent city vision, with political champions and the will and resources to deliver it. Without these, London will bump along, always reacting in a piecemeal fashion, not learning and thus wasting money, time and resources.

Everyone I talk to – and I talk with a lot of professionals in this sector – seems to know what the issues are and what the solutions could be.

So why is progress not happening? We’re still living in an age of ‘trophy projects’. You’ll know them when you see them. These projects are usually lavished with the finest materials and have overly finessed details (the windows, the doors, rooflines, railings, ‘bling’ in other words).

Yet the kind of places people like to dwell and linger need not be so thoroughly ‘presented’: a simple buggy test is sometimes all that is needed to make a place more people-centred, more walkable, more human. That means testing a neighbourhood to see what is broken, missing or needed – streetlamps, benches, and wider pavements for example – and then in a pragmatic fashion tackling these ‘bugs’ one by one. But in such a way that the result is a public realm fit to walk and cycle in first.

And then maybe – and it’s a really big maybe – we can invite a few cars to join us. ☺

Housing is a human right

Leading experts give their view on why a society that provides good homes for everyone is doing something right

The Housing Association's View The Architect's View

Former Peabody CEO Steve Howlett on why housebuilders must work closely with the communities they serve

With its amazing history, historic buildings, open spaces and cultural attractions, it's clear to see what brings so many people to London. Many people from all over the globe live and work here, helping to sustain our tolerant, diverse and open culture.

The capital is a city of wealth and opportunity, but many of its communities have not benefitted from London's increasing prosperity. There is an urgent need for more affordable homes across London to accommodate its growing population and to reduce homelessness. These need to be built to a high standard, to create thriving communities that we can be proud of. We must also ensure that the workers that are key to London's success can afford to live and work here.

Housing associations are building more homes than ever before and we have also seen the return of local authority house-building for the first time in a generation. There are other organisations innovating with the design of homes and providing bespoke products for first time buyers.

There's a lot that can be achieved through good design and planning, but a sense of community often grows from active involvement in the neighbourhood, and the spirit of togetherness and friendliness that goes along with that. By working with local residents to provide the things they want, such as green spaces, shops, cafés, and good public transport links, we can make a real difference to the very fabric of London.

During Les Trente Glorieuses – the post-WW2 consensus across Europe when it was generally accepted that decent shelter, education and health provision were the legitimate responsibility of governments – housing was not seen as an investment, or a repository for wealth, but as a right, which any civilized society should confer on its citizens as is recognised under the Geneva Convention.

Once housing is viewed as a commodity for speculation and trade, exploitation of the vulnerable follows naturally in its wake. That in our wealthy country, there are 28% children growing up in poverty – without the protection of a secure home – shows an abrogation by government of its first responsibility: to protect its citizens from harm.

Utopian cities must offer a balance between the universal need for belonging and identity, and the urge for freedom, choice and connectivity. For many decades it is the latter of these which has dominated.

The great destroyer of urban space is that supposed liberator, the private car. I regard the cities which have realised the need to restrain the car and prioritised walking and cycling as offering the utopian vision for the future.

In Copenhagen, 50% of all citizens commute by bike every day and there are more bikes than inhabitants. Many of our major cities that today are packed with cars actually have a past as cities of bicycles.

The Charity's View

Shelter suggests a new approach to housebuilding, one that will enable us to build high quality popular and affordable homes with a 'civic' approach.

In England we are not building enough homes – and haven't for at least a generation. It's at the heart of most housing problems we see, from rocketing house prices and falling home ownership, to increases in homelessness.

Not only that, but we are building too slowly and often ending up with unattractive and unpopular developments. A majority of people think the quality of new housing supply is 'poor' or 'very poor'. Members of the public are worried about the lack of facilities such as healthcare, education places and transport.

Shelter counters despair and disappointment with a new vision for housebuilding. 'New Civic Housebuilding' argues that our current system cannot solve England's shortage on its own, and instead offers a long-term, sustainable solution: increase housebuilding outside the speculative model through land market reform – combined with targeted public investment.

English housebuilding is dominated by one business model: 'speculative' housebuilding. These developers take big risks in the hope of achieving big rewards, the biggest of which is their land purchases. They base their price on their estimate of sale prices they will get for the homes they build. Whichever firm is able to squeeze its costs the most wins.

The reason new housing is prohibitively expensive is because developers' profits are dependent on maintaining high market values, so they build out slowly to not flood the local market and minimise affordable housing. Ultimately, sticking with the status quo would just see housing choices worsen.

We advocate using targeted land market intervention to build homes. 'Civic' housebuilding starts by bringing in land at a fairer cost and channels competition into raising the quality of homes, planning in active consultation with the community. We have seen this model in our history, but never at sufficient scale to rival speculative building.

We should be ambitious about what we can build. We are rightly proud in Britain of our heritage: historic market towns, universities, pioneering Victorian engineering. We know we can build beautiful, genuinely affordable homes. We can connect them to places of work and build them along with good new schools, medical facilities, public spaces and high streets. We've just got to get back into the habit.

People come first

Clarion Group's Director of Regeneration Bob Beaumont writes on commitment to creating lasting neighbourhoods

Influence and capacity to transform lives

In 2016 Circle Housing and Affinity Sutton merged to form Clarion Housing Group, the largest housing group in the country with plans to build 50,000 new homes over 10 years.

In April of this year they submitted proposals to transform three existing estates in the London Borough of Merton. These proposals will see £1 billion invested in the borough, delivery of 2,800 new homes and rehousing of all existing tenants and homeowners who wish to remain.

Local people are the experts

People come first. Working with existing communities defines an approach to creating better, happier, safe places to live and work. By creating a shared vision for regeneration we can collectively realise the long-term benefits. In turn we're enhancing places where people will want to spend time, work and put down roots for generations to come.

Homes that will last 100 years

We have over 100 years' heritage of place-making and remain committed to supporting our communities for the long term. We squeeze every possible benefit for the community out of our investment. Last year alone we invested £264.6m into building new homes and improving existing ones. Successful regeneration is where the benefits continue long after new homes have been built. Clarion's new homes and public spaces set the scene for change and – working alongside local businesses and community organisations – we create job opportunities and improve community facilities, green spaces and transport links.

Ho Ho Ho – it's off to work we go

Novelist and critic Will Wiles on how we work today

The office – and the workplace in general – is a paradoxical place. It is second only to our home in terms of the hours we spend there. Deduct the hours spent asleep from the home's total and the gap narrows. But we have precious little control over that second home. Even being there entails only questionable free will. In theory we can work wherever we please in a glorious, fluid free market; in daily reality, it's more complicated, and we can be pinned in place by a web of obligations and practicalities, at the centre of which is the overriding economic imperative to keep working.

And, other than a few knick-knacks and photos, most often we can't do much to shape our working environment. In Mike Judge's underrated 1999 film Office Space, a dehumanised drone working for a faceless American corporation that makes software for banks has a minor breakdown and loses all his terror of being fired. This being the only force that holds him in place, he begins to act without fear of consequences. He brings a power tool into the office and with it dismantles the grey acoustic walls of his cubicle, unblocking a view of the window and the trees beyond. It is an almost inconceivable rebellion against the existing order: he takes personal control over his environment.

Two of London's grandest Victorian buildings, the Foreign Office and the Midland Hotel at St Pancras Station, had dreary midlife periods in the post-war years as maltreated offices, before undergoing major renovation. The city's fabric is improved as a result, but one can't help but feel that they might have been more interesting places to explore before, when they were buried treasure; and perhaps they were freer places to work. Where are the buried treasures now? Still out there.

Perhaps in the future, preferred locations will be the citadels the tech firms are building for themselves in the city, such as Google's landscaper in the new world behind St Pancras. Though outwardly paragons of pastoral care and play-hard beanbag ping-pong fun, the new aristocracy may find they have built themselves a Versailles, part prison and part fishbowl, windows fogged from the citoyens keen to catch a glimpse. And who wants to have their slacking rebadged as creativity and presented as shareholder value? Talk about taking the fun out of it.

About five years ago I emancipated myself from the office environment. Working two rooms away from where you sleep has its advantages, not least the congenial commute. But I quickly found that I missed certain aspects. The presence of other people, the daily chitchat and gossip, was important, of course. But there was also the civil ritual of going to a second place, where different rules apply, in order to do work (that's what 'office' means, by the way, from the Latin 'to perform a task'). In the 21st century, there is a new breed of facilities to meet this need among the growing army of freelance creative workers – the co-working hub, where the self-employed can enjoy a workplace that hums with a bit more than the central heating, and can nibble at the edges of the Google life.

But when I started to fantasise about renting a bolt-hole somewhere, and my dream office formed in my mind, it was quite different: a small room off an institutional corridor of tile or lino, with shelves and metal filing cabinets and perhaps a door with a frosted glass section, where a signwriter could paint my name. It's revealing that this fantasy definitely emanates from a date before the invention of the integrated circuit: it's out of Chandler or Le Carré. Places like this still exist, in the buried treasure category, and my suggestion is that you start with London's amazingly fine selection of older municipal buildings and town halls. ☞

Made right here

Making things is still big business in the city by the Thames

Despite often being hidden from the streetscape, London is home to thousands of industrial sites, from large-scale factories like the Ford plant in Dagenham - which employs 2000 people - to tiny spaces producing anything from bread to bicycles.

As part of this year's programme we have partnered with the Greater London Authority to celebrate manufacturing in the capital, with the aim of encouraging and promoting local industry by drawing attention to the range of products made here in London.

Happy Birthday Foster + Partners

Norman Foster's pioneering studio – fifty this year – is hosting a special exhibition showcasing its amazing portfolio

This year marks significant milestones for both Open House and Foster + Partners, as they celebrate their 25th and 50th anniversaries respectively. For the past 20 years, Foster + Partners have opened their London studios to visitors for Open House weekend, giving them a glimpse into the creative process behind some of the projects at the practice.

This year, they are opening more of their studio space than ever before. You will have the opportunity to see the way they work, with interactive displays to give an insight into the work of specialist teams, alongside a special exhibition focusing on upcoming projects.

Foster + Partners is a global studio for architecture, urbanism and design, rooted in sustainability. Founded in 1967 by Lord Foster, it has a worldwide reputation for integrating architecture with engineering and other allied disciplines to establish an innovative approach to the design of buildings, spaces and cities. OH

Foster + Partners suggested building trail

Over the course of Open House weekend, use this itinerary to take in as many Foster + Partners projects as possible

Saturday 16

7am 30 St Mary Axe

Start at the Gherkin. Bring a book and a thermos of coffee - the building doesn't open its doors until 9am but those in the know start queuing early.

10.30am City Hall

Walk across the river via London Bridge and approach City Hall, focal point of the More London development that marked a radical change for London in reorienting the city's government towards the East.

12pm Crossrail Place

Heading further east, explore the roof garden of Crossrail Place, with its lattice roof providing a counterpoint from the towers of Canary Wharf.

3pm Capital City Academy

Take the Jubilee line up to Brent and catch the first tour of Foster + Partners first school project, built to accommodate modern teaching methods.

Sunday 17

10am One Bishops Square

Have breakfast in Bishops Square, bridging the City and the East End and Spitalfields Market, before having a tour of number One, occupied by Allen & Overy.

10.30am The Walbrook

Pass by the almost complete Bloomberg Headquarters, opening next year, and pop into The Walbrook, with its distinctive exterior solar shading, but also a hidden garden at the rear paved with slate.

12pm Millennium Bridge

Journey across the river by walking across the famous Millennium Bridge. Developed with sculptor Anthony Caro and Arup engineers, it was the first new crossing on this part of the Thames in more than a century, and now a key element in London's pedestrian infrastructure.

3pm Foster + Partners Studio

Finish your weekend at the home of Foster + Partners, in their custom-built double-height studio space, where they will be showing a special exhibition to celebrate their anniversary.

Open House Junior

Young minds are fascinated by buildings and places and how they fit together

Open House has a long history of running programmes for children. They just get it, in a way that adults don't (they don't get hung up on style, for starters).

It's also why Open City, the charity behind Open House, runs architectural and urban study programmes for schools across London, year-round. Open City's mission is to positively affect how Londoners think about the buildings and places they inhabit and give them the means to help shape them too. Starting with young Londoners is crucial.

Dinah Bornat, a partner at ZCD Architects, which has long researched the way children play on streets, says her firm's findings shows children are the generators of community life.

"In our practice we advocate for safe places to play that all age groups can use, ones that are easy to reach and spread throughout developments. We start by taking time to understand what children want: using techniques that put children at the heart of the process. This is the best way to get neighbourhood design right for everyone." Open City agrees, and our Open House Junior programme gives children the chance to learn about design through play.

Support Open City for a free Open House

Open City is a charity that champions great design in London's building and places. We believe that well-designed cities can improve people's lives. London must strive to be a more equitable city – one in which all citizens can have a stake in the design, development and care of the built environment.

Individual donations

If everyone who attended the Open House weekend donated just £1, the next event would be secured.

Take a Tour

Open City runs a programme of year-round tours to help support Open House and our education initiatives. Led by expert guides, they take in the best of London's architecture on foot, on bikes and on boats.

Benefactors

Open-City gives everyone the opportunity to discover and learn what makes great architecture. Those who share our passion can help us by joining our Benefactor Scheme.

Memberships

Partner with us and position your company as making an important contribution to London's built environment. Your investment will go a long way.

make

Make is an award-winning international architectural practice with a reputation for challenging convention and pursuing design excellence. Since we opened our doors in 2004, we've worked on nearly 1,400 projects worldwide covering a wide range of sectors. We've delivered 67 built schemes from studios across 3 continents, including 42 buildings and over a dozen masterplans.
